

March 7, 2025

The last year and a half felt successful. “Anomaly Time” was accepted and published in the Journal of Finance and I was able to polish and season my other work. I also received multiple invitations as an invited seminar speaker and as a discussant.

I submitted two papers to the FRA’s dual-submission conference with the JFE in Fall 2024. One of the papers, “Predicting Anomalies” made the cut and was invited for submission to the JFE. We recently received a favorable R&R and have a short list of improvements before sending it back. Our goal is to send it back by the end of April. The other paper I submitted, “(Not) Everybody’s Working for the Weekend: A Study of Mutual Fund Manager Effort” did not make the cut, though it has got on good conferences recently, including the European Finance Association and American Finance Association. I am working with my co-author on polishing a final section to that paper (a section recommended by the AFA discussant and potential referee) and then we are sending it out again.

I also submitted “Mutual Fund Shorts and the Benefits of Acquiring Information” to the Journal of Finance in Fall 2024. We were rejected but have good feedback. We are enhancing the paper and sending it out again.

My focus for the next 12 months is to get these papers (3 of them mentioned above) across the finish line. They are all well-seasoned and need to find a home. I anticipate “Predicting Anomalies” getting into an A journal given the R&R at JFE. I am hopeful for at least one of the other two to get into an A. We will find out this year.

I won’t mention all my other work specifically, but I will point out that our anomalies work has been well received and our third paper in the series is in its beginning stages. Initial results are promising and keep me up late at nights dreaming about this project. I anticipate it will move fast over the back-half of 2025.
